The base of any modern science is a complex of knowledge acquired by man in this area from ancient time to the present. And what we are today is the result of how ancient people tried to understand the world, themselves, their place in the world and their first scientific ideas about it. If we are talking about medicine it should be noted that many of the discoveries of our ancient ancestors are used in modern medicine.

Considering this the aim of the abstract is to reflect the importance of ancient knowledge for every field of our modern life including medicine.

If we are talking about India and its culture we should mention that Indians studied the surrounding nature earlier than other peoples and applied their knowledge to alleviate suffering. The very first medical texts were collected in the sacred Vedas. We can say that Vedas laid foundations of the most basic principles of today modern medicine. Here we should mention Vedanta as the most important branch of the philosophy of India that reflects all main cultural peculiarities and worldview of this country and the citizens. Vedanta Darshan also known as Uttar Mimamsa etymologically means “End of Vedas(Ved- Vedas, Anta means –end). Like in Europe, Renaissance philosophy came as a Reformation in Christianity similarly, Vedanta darshan came as Renaissance for Hinduism in 8th century. This philosophy mainly talks about the relation of life and brahma and how we can achieve it. In Hinduism, Brahm is the highest universal principle, the ultimate reality in the universe. We are so agree that in modern conditions, knowledge that was gained in ancient Indian tradition can play an important role in understanding the place of a doctor in human society in general and medicine in particular. This authentic philosophy describes the requirements for a doctor and his medical practice, emphasis on the qualities of the doctor and his duties. Much attention is paid to medical ethics and deontology that are legal today in the world medical practice.

Summing up, it is safe to say that this authentic philosophy describes the requirements for a doctor and his medical practice, emphasis on the qualities of the doctor and his duties. Much attention is paid to medical ethics and deontology that are legal today in the world medical practice.
